- Ask talkers if they would like to share their ideas.
- Casually move toward those talking.
- Make eye contact with them.
- Standing near the talkers, ask a near-by participant a question so that the new discussion is near the talkers.
- As a last resort, stop and wait.

Smile

The oft-repeated recommendation that you should never smile in the first two months of the school year is hogwash. A smile sends a subtle but powerful message to your class that kindness and politeness are expected. It also calms nervous energy and builds instant rapport and likability. This is critically important because when your students like you and are comfortable around you, they'll want to please you, listen to you and behave for you. As you meet your class, look them in the eye, say hello and smile.

Add a dose of fun

It's easy to get so caught up in teaching your objectives that you forget the importance of making school fun for students. If there is a secret to classroom management, this is it. When your students are happy, engaged and look forward to your class, you have powerful leverage to curb misbehavior because your consequences mean something to them. It is this combination of fun and accountability that will transform even the most difficult students. This doesn't mean you always have to have an interactive game at the ready or spend extra time planning, just be open to sharing a laugh with your students. Be yourself and never be afraid to show your personality. Tell hard-luck stories of your youth take attendance in a funny accent; answer a question as an opera singer. Enjoy your job. Your students will love you for it.
